Books of the East, Vol. 23: Translated by Various Oriental Scholars (Classic Reprint):

Excerpt from The Sacred Books of the East, Vol. 23: Translated by Various Oriental Scholars For a satisfactory translation of these texts, the etymological and comparative method is generally considered as the best or as the only possible one, on account of the entire absence of any traditional interpretation. I have tried, however, to reduce the sphere of etymological guess work to its narrowest limits, with the help of different Pahlavi, Persian, and Sanskrit translations, which are as yet unpublished, and have been neglected by former translators. I found such translations for the Sirozahs for Vasts I, VI, VII, XI, XXIII, XXIV, and for the Nyayis¹ (besides the already published translations of Vasts XXI and XXII).
